Intersectionality considers the ways in which different forms and norms of social stratification, such as class, disability, race, religion, and sexual orientation, overlap with gender. Intersectional feminism claims and promotes social equity and unpacks various systems of power and discrimination. How does intersectionality relate to design, architecture, urbanism and spatial justice? In what ways do intersectional gender practices and theories impact architecture and the production and consumption of spaces? Why does intersectionality matter in architecture and urbanism? This seminar offers an introduction to the histories of intersectional gender practices and theories in their intrinsic relationship to designed and built environments.

ARCH 3819/5819 or ARCH 4408/6408
Wednesday 10:10am-12:05pm 261B E Sibley
Cornell University - Department of Architecture